

21st March 2019

The 2025 problem

The 2025 problem is simply Japan's declining birthrate and aging population. I think it is one of the problems that always occur in developed countries regardless of Japan.

It is thought that the biggest problem in the 2025 problem is a decrease in labor production population and an increase in the national pension burden and medical expenses for the elderly

Population decline and tax revenue decline take local government strength.

As a result, the reduction of public services is expected.

Our public halls are no exception and we would be unable to maintain the 3600 halls.

It might be a time when a new role for the local community is required.

